Note: Javelins of this era were made of solid wood (ash or birch was typical) with metal tips, and their diameters were on the average some 25% smaller than today's models. Many implements were fabricated in school wood/metal shops, so consistency among flight characteristics of this era were suspect. Comparisons between this era's performances and those of today's all-metal and composite-metal combination javelins with larger aerodynamic surfaces are speculative at best. Completely separate records are necessary should the javelin be re-introduced into the OHSAA program.
